

Is biomass a source of electricity in French Guiana?

Traditional biomass - the burning of charcoal, crop waste, and other organic matter - is not included. This can be an important source in lower-income settings. French Guiana: How much of the country's electricity comes from nuclear power? Nuclear power - alongside renewables - is a low-carbon source of electricity.

Is French Guiana a risky jurisdiction for energy companies?

When that is then coupled with the poor exploration history of offshore French Guiana, weak oil prices, the volatile outlook for crude oil prices and the looming emergence of peak oil demand, it is a risky jurisdiction for energy companies with little upside.

What is French Guiana's oil exploration history?

French Guiana's oil exploration history is mixed and there have been few discoveries made over the last decade, despite the considerable drilling success reported for Guyana's section of the Guyana-Suriname Basin. Way back in 2011, Africa and South America-focused oil explorer Tullow made the Zaedyus-1 oil discovery in the Guyane Maritime license.

Will French Guiana allow offshore drilling?

A major impediment to offshore drilling in French Guiana is the French national government's complete ban on the extraction of crude oil and natural gas in any of France's territories, which comes into effect in 2040.

Is French Guiana part of the Guyana-Suriname basin?

Not only do French Guiana's territorial waters include part of the prodigious Guyana-Suriname Basin but its offshore ocean floor is thought to share geological characteristics with the West African Atlantic margin where the giant Jubilee oil discovery was made by Tullow Oil.

Is total drilling in French Guiana?

In December 2018, the French oil supermajor announced it was drilling an exploration well in offshore French Guiana roughly 150 kilometers from the nearest coast to confirm whether an exploitation phase was appropriate. That well came up dry and Total announced in February 2019 that it was abandoning offshore drilling operations in French Guiana.
